If you love movies with lots of high-speed car chases, martial art fights, gun battles and big explosions, you are a fan of action movies. This genre includes superhero movies like Captain Marvel movies, spy movies like James Bond or Mission Impossible movies, martial arts movies like Japanese samurai films or Chinese kung fu movies, and action-packed thrillers like Fast and Furious or Mad Max movies. The most successful action movies are often from major Hollywood studios like Universal Pictures, Marvel Studios, Warner Bros, Paramount Pictures etc. There are a lot of movies with big budgets, the most famous actors, expensive special effects and spectacular action scenes. Millions of action movie fans all over the world flock to see them as soon as they are released. To create these special effects and breathtaking action scenes, directors use computer-generated imagery, or CGI. CGI is used for visual effects because the quality is often higher and effects are more controllable than other more physically based processes. When we see a superhero like Spiderman swinging from building to building, or we see an entire city collapsing or burning, we are probably watching scenes created with CGI. Before the invention of CGI, directors had to film real explosions and fires created by experts in pyrotechnics, and they had to use specially-trained actors to perform dangerous stunts like jumping from moving trains and falling off speeding motorbikes. Since the invention of CGI, more and more action films have been
